Departure Dates

Best time to visit South Africa

While South Africa is an all-weather destination, you need to choose your season with care especially if you have wildlife viewing in mind. The South African weather is marked by two distinct seasons; the dry season and the rainy season. Within that the dry season picks up in June and goes on through October. Rain showers at this time are few and far between as the climate is typically cool and sunny. Pick the cooler months between May and September to head out for a game drive because the chances of spotting the Big Five are higher as they come out to graze. For a camping safari, this however, may not be the ideal time as the nights tend to get quite nippy. Cape Town, for instance, has a hot and dry summer between November and February. But for those interested in a coastal drive to Hermanus to watch the migration of the southern right whales, July to November is an ideal time. The northern part of South Africa receives rains between November and February, a time highly preferred by ardent birders. December is South Africa's high season, frequent thunderstorms notwithstanding. Christmas holidays bring in crowds to its beaches from all over the world spiking up accommodation rates.
